C) Sample Description	Sample – F3
D) Sample Form	Samples: Liquid
E) Activity:	In vitro Alpha-amylase

Activity:

Importance Alpha-amylase enzyme in the body:

In humans, the digestion of starch involves several stages. Initially, partial digestion by the salivary amylase results in the degradation of polymeric substrates into shorter oligomers. Later on in the gut these are further hydrolyzed by pancreatic alpha amylases into maltose, maltotriose and small malto-oligosaccharides. The digestive enzyme (alpha-amylase) is responsible for hydrolyzing dietary starch (maltose), which breaks down into glucose prior to absorption. Inhibition of alpha amylase can lead to reduction in post prandial hyperglycemia in diabetic condition (Roux et al., 2001., Lonkischer et al., 1998)

Treatment of diabetes include: improvement of the activity of insulin at the objective tissues, with the utilization of sensitizers (biguanides, thiozolidinediones); incitement of endogenous insulin discharge with the utilization of sulfonylureas (glibenclamide, glimepiride), and decrease of the interest for insulin utilizing particular enzyme inhibitors (acarbose, miglitol)

Assay of Amylase Inhibition

In vitro amylase inhibition was studied by the method of Bernfeld [14]. In brief, 200 µL to 1000µL of the test compound was allowed to react with 500 µL of 0.1M phosphate buffer pH 6.9 containing α-amylase enzyme (fungal diastage (0.5%)) After 10-minute incubation at 250C, 500 µL of 1% starch solution in 0.1M phosphate buffer pH6.8 was added. Again incubated at 250c for 10 min. The assay was performed for the controls where 500 µL of the enzyme was replaced by buffer. After incubation, 1000 µL of dinitrosalicylic acid reagent was added to both control and test. The reaction was stopped by boiling water bath for 10 min and cooled. The absorbance was recorded at 540 nm using
